

The Wise Guide to Winning Grants

HOW TO FIND FUNDERS AND WRITE WINNING PROPOSALS

SECOND EDITION

Waddy Thompson

Stitch-in-Time Books

Copyright © 2021 by Waddy Thompson

All rights reserved. No part of this book shall be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without written permission from the publisher. No patent liability is assumed with respect to the use of the information contained herein. Although every precaution has been taken in the preparation of this book, the publisher and author assume no responsibility for errors or omissions. Neither is any liability assumed for damages resulting from the use of information contained herein.

Note: This publication contains the opinions and ideas of its author. It is intended to provide helpful and informative material on the subject matter covered. It is sold with the understanding that the author and publisher are not engaged in rendering professional services in the book. If the reader requires personal assistance or advice, a competent professional should be consulted.

The author specifically disclaims any responsibility for any liability, loss, or risk, personal or otherwise, which is incurred as a consequence, directly or indirectly, of the use and application of any of the contents of this book.

Stitch-in-Time Books
3352 E. Chelmsford Ct.
Sarasota, FL 34235

The Wise Guide to Winning Grants, Waddy Thompson., 2nd edition, June 2021
ISBN: 978-0-9985124-9-5

www.grantadviser.com
Cover design concept by Flyleaf Creative; cover design by Jakob Vala
Images used under license from Shutterstock.com

Contents

Introduction.....	1
Part 1: Getting Started	3
1: The Practice of Grant Writing.....	4
You Already Are a Grant Writer!.....	5
Like Writing Mom and Dad.....	6
Why Grant Writing Is the Answer.....	8
The Stock Market and Grants.....	9
The Complete Grant Writer.....	9
A Week-by-Week Guide.....	11
2: The ABCs of Grants.....	13
A Closer Look at Grants.....	13
Who Can Receive a Grant?.....	14
What Can You Raise Money For?.....	18
What Funders Look For.....	22
Part 2: Where the Money Is.....	24
3: A Foundation Primer.....	25
The Types of Foundations.....	26
Family Foundations.....	29
Community Foundations.....	30
Operating Foundations.....	32
Commercial Foundations.....	32
Foundations in Name Only.....	33
Venture Philanthropy.....	33

Corporate Foundations.....	35
Foundations as the IRS Sees Them	35
4: A Corporation Primer	39
Corporate Foundations.....	40
Corporate Foundations Versus Contributions Offices	41
Local Versus National Giving	42
Corporate Matching Gifts	42
Corporate Grants Versus Sponsorship	42
Free Stuff and Free Consulting.....	45
And the Letter Gets Sent Where?	46
5: A Government Primer	49
State and Local Grants	50
Federal Grants	51
It's Never Free Money.....	55
Who You Really Know: Earmarks.....	55
6: An Individual Donor Primer	57
Why People Give Away Their Money	58
Propose to Me, and See What Happens.....	58
The Cost of Giving	66
Part 3: Research, or Just How Nosy Are You?	69
7: You Can Find It Online	70
Foundations.....	71
Corporations.....	76
Today's News (And Yesterday's).....	77
Government Funders.....	77
People	78

Research Portals.....	79
8: You Can Find It Offline	80
Libraries.....	81
People Information	81
Periodicals	81
The Stuff You Used to Throw Away	82
9: Narrowing Your Prospects	84
Get the Details.....	84
Avoid False Leads.....	85
Funders Have Needs, Too	86
Part 4: Strategies for Success	89
10: Sow Before You Reap	90
Newsletters.....	90
Getting Your E-mail Opened.....	92
Events.....	93
11: Testing the Waters	95
Whom to Contact.....	95
Inquiry Letters.....	96
Inquiry Calls.....	98
Informational Meetings	99
When to Pull Strings.....	101
12: Planning for Success, Now and Tomorrow.....	104
Developing a Grant-Writing Plan	104
Developing a Three-Year Funding Plan.....	106
Live by Your Schedule.....	109
To Win Friends and Manipulate People	112

To Save Your Sanity	112
Part 5: Writing the Proposal	113
13: The Parts of a Grant Proposal	114
Making the Case for Support.....	114
Purpose of the Program.....	116
Why You Are Doing This Project.....	117
How You Will Make It Happen	119
Who Will Do What?.....	120
Who Will Benefit	121
How You Will Know You've Done Well	122
Diversity and Community Outreach	123
Summing It All Up	123
14: Selling Your Project.....	125
Making a Persuasive Argument for Each Funder	126
Buzz, Buzz, Buzzwords	128
Process Versus Outcomes	129
Operating Support Proposals.....	132
Last Call.....	133
15: Dollars and Cents	135
Budget Basics	135
Who	136
What: Direct Expenses.....	138
What: Indirect Expenses.....	139
When	141
Where.....	141
How	141

Budget Narrative	143
Putting It All Together	143
Multiyear Budgets	147
Organizational Budget	147
Budget Workshop.....	149
16: The Cover Letter and Executive Summary	151
Know Your Audience.....	152
For Current and Recent Funders.....	154
For New Funders.....	156
An Executive Summary Is Not Another Cover Letter	158
17: Repute and Tribute	162
You've Got History with This Issue.....	162
Testimonials	165
Staff and Consultant Bios.....	166
Legal Status.....	166
Everything Else.....	166
18: Putting It All Together.....	169
Final Internal Review.....	169
You Can Be Too Pretty	170
Playing to Your Audience.....	171
Getting the Package Delivered	172
19: Types of Applications.....	174
Online Proposals	174
E-Mail Submissions	176
Letter Proposals	176
Form Proposals	178

Part 6: After You Submit the Proposal	180
20: Waiting for and Receiving the Verdict.....	181
Don't Be a Nudge.....	181
Handling Rejection.....	182
21: Reporting on Success.....	189
Developing a Relationship.....	189
Giving Credit Where Credit's Due.....	190
Keeping in Touch	191
Progress Reports.....	191
Spending the Money	194
The Final Report	196
Combined Final Report and Renewal Request	199
 Part 7: Grant Writing for Yourself	 201
22: Advice for Individual Grant Seekers	202
Research Is Still the First Step	202
Web Portals for Individual Grant Seekers.....	203
Reference Works for Individual Grant Seekers	204
How Does "Me.org" Sound?.....	205
Grant Proposals for Individuals.....	205
The Professional Resumé	205
Statement of Purpose	208
Expressing Yourself in Numbers	209
23: Working as a Freelance Grant Writer.....	211
The Makings of a Freelance Grant Writer	211
Developing a Portfolio	212
Creating a Resumé	212

Bragging Rights	213
Working with Clients	215
Finding Work.....	217
The Efficient Practice	218
24: The Business Side of Freelancing.....	220
To Incorporate or Not?	220
Setting Your Fee	221
Calculating Your Fee	223
Good Contracts Make for Good Clients	224
Avoid Conflicts of Interests.....	226

Appendices

A: Glossary.....	228
B: Sample Foundation Grant Proposal.....	234
C: Sample Corporate Grant Proposal.....	242
D: Sample Sponsorship Proposal	248
E: Sample Government Grant Proposal.....	251
F: Sample Final Report	258
G: Checklist for a Grant Proposal.....	264
H: The Hallmarks of a Good Grant Writer.....	266
About the Author	267
Also by the Author.....	268
Additional Resources	268

Part 3, Research, or Just How Nosy Are You? guides you in satisfying your curiosity about funders and all the people associated with them, and how to use that information to win them over.

Part 4, Strategies for Success, teaches you the little tricks of the trade to warm up your prospects before you ask them for money and to get yourself organized so everything can proceed according to a plan.

Part 5, Writing the Proposal, shows you how to gather the information you need from your colleagues and put it into the form the funder wants to receive, including spelling it out in dollars and cents in the budget.

Part 6, After You Submit the Proposal, covers what might be the most difficult part of the whole business—waiting to hear how you did. It also takes a look at the all-important subject of reporting.

Part 7, Working for Yourself as a Grant Writer, provides information for individuals seeking grants, who face special challenges. Finally, you'll find two chapters of advice on how to earn money as a freelance grant writer.

The appendices include a glossary that covers all the insider lingo, examples of complete grants, a proposal checklist, and the hallmarks of a good grant writer.

Acknowledgments

During the past three decades, I've been fortunate to work for many knowledgeable people who introduced me to the philanthropic and grant-seeking world. I've learned so much from each of them, but I also have learned much from the grant writers who have worked for me. They, too, have given me insights into the process of getting a grant, while putting up with my endless editing of their documents. Special thanks go to my colleagues Leah Maddrie, Kate Taylor, and Rados Piletich, who read and gave me advice on various parts of this book.

I must also thank Theodore Berger, retired executive director of the New York Foundation for the Arts (NYFA), for allowing me to include examples from NYFA grants. All examples in this book not related to NYFA are about fictional charities, and no funder referred to in any grant-writing example is intended to represent the policies and intent of any actual funder.

Trademarks

All terms mentioned in this book that are known to be or are suspected of being trademarks or service marks have been appropriately capitalized. Use of a term in this book should not be regarded as affecting the validity of any trademark or service mark.

Getting Started

It's always good to get the lay of the land before beginning any endeavor. In Part 1, you discover just what grant writing is all about, including what knowledge, skills, and disposition you need to bring to the practice of grant writing. This part also considers why you might want to write a grant proposal and briefly covers what that process involves.

Although everyone would like to receive a grant, institutions that make grants operate within a relatively narrow compass. You'll learn who is eligible for grants and what kinds of activities will be rewarded with a grant.

The Practice of Grant Writing

In This Chapter

- Grant writing defined
- Why grant writing is right for you
- How the economy affects grants
- What it means to be a grant writer
- Time line for success

Grant writing is one of those topics that seems very technical and esoteric, yet you probably already know more about it than you think you do. But before I go any further, let's be clear about just what grant writing is and isn't.

Grant writing is the skill or practice of asking for money in the form of a grant from a foundation, corporation, or government agency by crafting a well-considered document (the proposal) that outlines how the money will be used, what receiving the money will accomplish, and who will undertake the tasks described in the proposal.

Grant writing is not about writing a group of friends to get each of them to give $25 for the local library. (That sort of fundraising is called direct mail or unsolicited third-class mail, but never junk mail if you are in the business of raising money.)

Grant writing is about creating a proposal, which you can send to local corporations or foundations asking for several thousand dollars for the local library. On occasion, proposals will be written to individuals when a four- to seven-figure gift is being sought, and I cover that in this book, too. But for the most part, you'll be concerned with getting largish sums of money from some kind of institution or another. Grant writing is an important part of any fundraising program, which would likely also include at least direct mail, major gifts, and special events.

I start off with what I think you already know and finish this chapter with the key things you need to know about the practice of grant writing. Then I show you how to pursue the technical aspects in the remaining chapters of the book.

You Already Are a Grant Writer!

If you're anything like me, when you were in college or away at summer camp, you found it easiest to remember to contact home just when your wallet was getting a little thin. Believe it or not, that was your first grant-writing experience. (I hope you were successful!)

Asking for money is never easy, but anyone can acquire the skills to ask like a professional fundraiser. This book tells you how to do that, but like so many important life lessons, you'll find you learned the basics much earlier in life. In case your memory is fuzzy on what those emails home were like, I've included a "Dear Mom and Dad" email to refresh your memory.

Dear Mom and Dad,

Thanks so much for the check you sent a couple of weeks ago. It really came just in the nick of time so I could get all the books for the new semester.

College is great! You probably saw the basketball game on TV last weekend. It was really something to actually be there. The college has a terrific series of concerts in the Coliseum, too, with first-class bands.

There are so many things to do and see, but recently I have not been able to do and see as many things as my friends because I've been running low on funds. If you could send me an extra $100 to tide me over to the end of the month, that would really be great!

It's not that I expect to go out every night. Most of my time is still spent studying, especially for Psych 101, which is really tough, but I think it is the subject I like the best. Reading the case studies has really brought home to me what great parents you are.

When do you think you'll come up for a visit? Hope it's soon, and if you could help me out with a check really soon, I'd really appreciate it.

Love,

Jack

Like Writing Mom and Dad

You can learn many things from that "Dear Mom and Dad" email that will serve you well as a grant writer. Let's take a closer look at it to see some of the points of similarity.

Because Jack's email home was not the first time he had ever asked for money, he was seeking a renewal grant. So Jack naturally started out telling his parents how he had used the last money they sent. And note that his very first word was "Thanks"—the magic word that can open so many doors. It's so important to always acknowledge past support. No one—not a parent or a funder—ever wants to be taken for granted.

Jack follows his opening by telling his parents what has been happening at school to make them feel involved and current. Every funder will want to know what significant things are happening in your organization right now, whether they're related to the specific grant or not.

Eventually Jack had to actually ask for money, which to be convincing, had to include some ideas on how he'd spend this new money. Jack's pretty vague on this, so he must be looking for general operating support rather than funds for a specific project.

Note that he does at least ask for a specific amount. People like to know what you expect of them, so always be specific in your grant proposals—don't make them guess how much the new bus will cost or how much it takes to build a website. And don't ask a funder for too much or too little. Your best guide to how much to ask for is how much the funder has given to organizations similar to yours. Check the funder's annual report or IRS return for lists of grants.

Usually, when seeking general operating support, you would make a point of covering a wide range of issues your charity addresses. Jack can assume his parents have an intimate acquaintance with his general operating needs, so he doesn't have to go into detail here.

Jack knows to end on a high note, staying positive and connecting emotionally with his parents one last time to remind them why they really want to write him that check. He isn't shy about pushing his parent's emotional buttons. (Who knows best where they are; he probably "installed" some of them!)

Jack's big advantage over you or me in writing a grant proposal is that he wrote based on a relationship built up over nearly two decades. The prospects were knowledgeable about the cause to which they were being asked to contribute. And because of the long relationship, they were predisposed to responding positively to his request.

So how do you create a level of knowledge and (hopefully) a predisposition to a positive response? In the fundraising business it's called cultivation, through which you develop the prospect over a period of time so the proposal arrives on the desk of someone who is well informed about your organization (if not necessarily about your project). "Cultivation before solicitation" is one of my favorite sayings, and one that everyone who works for me is tired of hearing. You don't have to hear too much more on the subject from me until Chapter 10.

Now let's use Jack's email as a guide to write a simple—very simple—grant proposal:

*Ms. Betty Smith
Executive Director
Small Town Foundation
123 Main Street
Anywhere, IL 60000*

Dear Ms. Smith:

Thank you again for Small Town Foundation's generous $15,000 gift to support our after-school activities last year. It was much appreciated by our staff, board of directors, and all those we serve.

Since we received your gift, 75 additional children have become regular participants in the activities offered at our center. You might have seen the short write-up that appeared in the local paper about us. Although this recognition was important, the looks in the eyes of our children are the true rewards.

We are writing now to ask that you renew your $15,000 gift this year. Your funds will be used to further expand the number of children we can accommodate each day by making it possible to retain an additional teacher's aide.

I would love to arrange a visit so you can see firsthand what your gift can accomplish. Please give me a call at 312-555-1212 or e-mail me at execdir@all4youth.org, and I'm sure we can find a time to meet. Your kind consideration of this proposal is greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,

Mary Stuart, Executive Director

That's a much simpler proposal than you'll ever write, but you get the point. Grant writing is no big mystery. It doesn't require a Ph.D., but you do need to know how to put the parts together, avoid amateurish pitfalls, and convince others of the importance of what you're writing about.

If you were good at writing please-send-money emails home from college, you're going to be a great grant writer. And if you lived at home and never wrote one of these emails, well, congratulations! You probably have experience in face-to-face solicitation, which is also a good skill in fundraising.

You say you never needed money from your parents? Well, maybe you'll soon be the one making grants to your own kids. But whatever your experience, this book will take you from simple show-me-the-money letters to fully developed grant proposals.

Why Grant Writing Is the Answer

No one grows up wanting to be a grant writer (or any kind of fundraiser, for that matter). Most of us fall into it out of necessity, either as part of our jobs or because we want to raise some significant money for a cause we believe in.

You might want to write a grant proposal, for example, if...

- You can't face one more bake sale for the soccer team.
- You see your local seniors' center needs a big infusion of cash to keep a program going.
- The local library's new book budget has been slashed by the city, and a group of neighbors wants to help out.
- You're on the board of a new nonprofit group that can't yet afford professional development staff.
- You're raising funds for your own art project.

Whatever your motivation for wanting to be a grant writer, you'll want to produce a professional proposal that will withstand the scrutiny of foundation staff and get funded!

Despite the proliferation of new foundations in the last two decades, there are still far more organizations and individuals seeking grants than there are organizations and individuals making grants. In fact, nonprofits outnumber grantmaking foundations by about 20 to 1. Many well-known organizations have large, well-paid development staffs vying for this money, but that doesn't mean you won't be successful. Fortunately, there are foundations and other grantmakers for every size organization and every conceivable cause. Private foundations in the United States alone give away as much as $58 billion annually.

In this book, I cover everything you need to know to write a successful grant proposal. You'll learn how to research prospects, cultivate relationships within and outside your charity, develop a complete proposal in several common formats, create a budget that also tells a story, and end up with a proposal that will stand out from a foundation's slush pile.

The Stock Market and Grants

Everyone whom you might approach for a grant lives in the same economic world as you and I. This means that when times are good and the stock market is riding high, foundations have more money to give away, corporations have greater profits from which to support charities, and governments are flush with taxes. Obviously, the opposite is true when times are hard.

If your charity receives a large percentage of its income from foundations and corporations, economic downturns will dramatically affect your funding. Individuals tend to give more to the causes they most believe in during tough times, but they might drop charities in which they have less interest. Government funders generally are affected a bit later, when tax income falls. All this, of course, is a good argument for not relying too heavily on one source of funding.

Foundations are required by law to spend 5 percent of their assets each year on grants and related expenses. Few rarely give more than that. After the national tragedy of September 11, 2001, occurred, many foundations dipped into their principle to make large emergency grants—that is, they gave away more than they earned on their investments in 2001, but that was an exceptional time in every regard.

A grant writer should always be aware of how the economy might be affecting those she is soliciting. In lean times, foundations tend to take on fewer new grantees, preferring to maintain their commitments to their current charities. When times are tough, one of the first things corporations eliminate is corporate giving. And because many corporate foundations are funded year by year, there's not even an endowment to fall back on. Government funding can be particularly capricious, being affected by the political agendas of those in power as well as by the economy. In 2010, states sharply reduced or eliminated support for many sectors, including social services that were already struggling to meet basic human needs.

In a slow economy, the grant writer's job becomes much more difficult. The grant writer must spend more time getting current funders to renew grants rather than sending out lots of new proposals. Just remember, though, that foundations still have to give money to someone, so it might as well be you.

The Complete Grant Writer

A grant writer is someone who can craft elegant, clear, concise sentences that can convey passion as well as detailed information. Often you'll be called upon to describe technical facts (for example, in a grant for a new computer network) or concepts and procedures about which you know nothing (as in a scientific proposal) or abstract concepts that lie well outside your daily life (as in a research proposal).

A good grant writer learns enough about the subject to write intelligently and make the subject comprehensible to others who have no background in the subject. The grant writer also reflects the passion and enthusiasm of the people who run the project or program to get whoever reads the proposal equally excited about the project. Don't be shy about asking program staff about their program—they'll probably be thrilled to know someone is interested in what they do.

A Diplomat

A grant writer must be a diplomat who helps the people running programs get their ideas into shape. Many people who run programs are so close to the program they can't see how to explain it clearly to someone unfamiliar with the project or organization—and many simply are just not good writers.

The grant writer takes the words from the program staff and states their ideas in plain English, without making the program staff feel belittled. The grant writer must often also be an advocate with senior staff and board members.

A Financier

A grant writer is a financially savvy person who can make numbers speak as clearly as words. Numbers can tell any story you want them to tell. Your budget should reflect the project's narrative description and include enough detail to be convincing, but not so much as to restrict the execution of the program.

Crunching the numbers and presenting the numbers are very different talents. The grant writer needs to do both, but more of the latter.

A Nosy Parker

A grant writer is also full of curiosity, willing to go to any length to ferret out information about funders to find the right match for his organization.

A grant writer is interested in people—those for whom he is trying to raise money, as well as those from whom he hopes to get the money.

A Passionate Advocate

But mostly, a grant writer needs passion for the cause at the heart of the proposal. After all, if you don't care deeply about your project, why should the funder?

Although grant writing might sound like a solitary activity, in the course of preparing a grant proposal, you actually interact with a wide range of people, including program and executive staff at your charity, members of your board of directors, and staff at foundations and corporations. On the other hand, it's something you can do on a part-time basis working from home.

Grant writing can be quite a lucrative profession. The positions at different charities go by a variety of names, including grants officer, institutional giving manager, foundation/corporation/government affairs manager, director of development for institutional giving, and many others.

Salaries for grant writers vary widely, according to the type of charity and the size of its budget. Generally, fundraisers at hospitals and universities make the highest salaries; social services charities tend to pay the least, with the arts somewhere in between. Expect to make from $30,000 with a small organization away from a major metropolitan area to $100,000 for writing grants and supervising others at a major institution.

If you're considering doing grant writing as a consultant, be aware that, in many states, all fundraising consultants must register with the state attorney general. In some cases, you must also register with the state in which any funder you approach is located.

If you're hiring a consultant to help with grant writing, check with your state's attorney general's office to see if registration is required, and be sure your consultant has the necessary registration (if any).

One final note on consultants: professional fundraising consultants work for a flat fee, never a percentage of what they raise. (You can learn more about being a consultant in Chapters 23 and 24.)

A Week-by-Week Guide

It's important to allow yourself enough time to prepare your grant proposal, especially your first one. The great unknown in preparing a grant is how long the internal review at your charity will take. If your executive director is a real stickler who lives to edit someone else's prose, allow additional time for review.

The following timeline assumes you've spent at least several months cultivating a range of prospects so that when the right project came along, they were already primed and ready to receive your proposal.

Week 1: Most proposals you write will be for specific projects, so you'll have to get to know the ins and outs of the project before you can do anything. Allow at least a week to get information from others and digest it. You'll have time during the inevitable rewrites to continue learning and digesting.

Weeks 2 and 3: Research to find the best funder matches for the project, and write or call for guidelines (if not available on the Internet). This is the most crucial stage in the proposal process. If you haven't done all your homework, you won't stand a chance at success.

Week 4: Complete research, checking to see if anyone connected with your organization knows anyone connected with the funder, and review information received from funders.

Weeks 5 and 6: Write the proposal, and share it with program staff and others. Make revisions and more revisions.

Week 7: Make final edits, contact the funder when appropriate, and mail the proposal or complete the online form well in advance of the funder's deadline.

Week 8: Relax and wait.

Week 9: Make a follow-up call to see if the application was received.

Weeks 10 through 25 or longer: Patiently wait for news from the funder.

Weeks 12 through 52: The check arrives! General rejoicing!

As you can see, grant writing involves a lot more than just writing, but that's what makes it interesting and challenging for those of us who do it. I love learning about the new projects I raise money for, and it's so gratifying when a grant is successful and you know it was you who helped buy the books for the library, provided daycare for more kids, or helped people learn to read.

Note: If you need money in less than 3 months, you're better off approaching an individual. Institutions move slowly.

But what makes you eligible for a grant, and what's a reasonable grant request? You'll find out in Chapter 2.

Important Points to Remember

- Asking Mom and Dad for money and approaching a foundation aren't all that different.
- Grant writing can produce substantial sums.
- Grant monies for charities decline in a down economy—just like everything else—and rise when times are good.
- The grant writer's best friends are knowledge and passion.
- A good grant writer possesses diplomatic skills, financial acumen, curiosity, and passion.
- From concept to grant check can take 6 months to a year—or longer.

The Parts of a Grant Proposal

In This Chapter

- Making a convincing argument for support
- What goes into a program description
- Addressing your proposal to the right audience

When you use the word proposal, the program (or project) description is probably what comes to mind. It's the heart and soul of your proposal—the place where you go into all the details about the program's execution as well as its underlying philosophy. Although the pitch you make in the cover letter (see Chapter 16) might more obviously be written to sell your program, don't forget that the program description must reinforce everything you put in the cover letter, continuing to sell the funder on the program and your charity's ability to perform it.

To write a program description that sells, you have to keep in mind what the funder wants to support and balance that against what your charity plans to do. You have to preserve both perspectives through the numerous stages in editing. I show you how to do that, as well as explain the many elements that go into a proposal, in this chapter.

Making the Case for Support

If you want a funder to support your project or organization with a grant, you have to present a convincing argument to bring them to that conclusion. This is known as making the case for support. Each element that makes up the project description helps make the case for support.

A good case for support immediately captures the reader's imagination, usually with a bold statement of purpose or a surprising fact the reader might not know. It goes on to describe the problem you plan to solve and how your charity will work to solve it. It must also convey a feeling of urgency to make the reader want to give you the grant right now. The case for support is the essential part of any funding request. It engages the reader, explains why the project or organization needs and is worthy of support, and demonstrates the urgency with which funding is needed.

Good cases for support bear a strong relationship to other types of persuasive writing. In their book Made to Stick: Why Some Ideas Survive and Others Die, Chip Heath and Dan Heath sum up their guide to successful writing with the mnemonic "SUCCES," which stands for "simple, unexpected, concrete, credible, emotional, and stories." That's the best summary of how to create good fundraising copy I've ever seen. As you read on, think about how each part of the case for support fulfills one or more aspects of their principle.

Here are the essential parts of the proposal (or case for support):

Purpose of the program. Stated simply, what will the project accomplish?

Why you are doing this project. Why is the program needed? Does any other organization have a similar program? If so, how does what you will do differ? How does your program fit with your charity's mission?

How you will make it happen. What resources (personnel, technical, facility, financial) are needed to carry out the program? What are the steps you'll take to prepare for and to execute the program?

Who will do what. Who will run the program? What staff will be involved, and how much time will each person devote to this project? Will you use consultants? A combination of staff, consultants, and volunteers? What will the roles of each be?

Who will benefit. How many people will the program serve, and who are they? Why is it important to serve these people? Can you illustrate the effects of your program with a story about one of your clients or constituents? This is one of the most important parts of any proposal!

How you will know you've done well. What results do you expect from the program? How will you evaluate it? What are its goals and objectives? Goals and objectives are often spoken about as if they are the same thing, but they're actually quite different. Goals represent the ultimate achievement of your program or organization; it might well be unreachable. Objectives are the measurable steps needed to get there. You usually will have several objectives to reach to achieve the goal. Likewise, there will be several benchmarks you must achieve to complete each objective. Goals are broad and about the outcome. Objectives are narrow and about the process.

For example, the ultimate goal of the United Nations might be thought of as world peace. Its objectives would embrace universal education and health care and elimination of nuclear armaments. The benchmarks to be achieved would include resolving specific disputes around the world and improving agriculture in different countries.

The chart below shows how these important terms relate to one another.

GOAL

Objective 1

Benchmark 1

Benchmark 2

Benchmark 3

Objective 2

Benchmark 1

Benchmark 2

Benchmark 3

Summing it all up. Can you sum up the proposal into two or three sentences to leave the funder with a simple picture they can readily remember? People tend to skip to the end of documents. Can you use a surprising example here to stick in the reader's memory?

The ability to weave together the answers to these questions into a seamless, readable narrative represents the grant writer's primary skill. In large organizations, different people conduct research, and still others prepare the budgets, but writing the project description remains the province of the grant writer.

The order you present the necessary information can vary, especially if a funder specifies some other order. Always follow the funder's instructions to the letter.

You can use this list of elements as a questionnaire to gather information from the people running the program. You'll probably go back to them several times in the process for more information or clarifications. Be sure to let someone directly involved in carrying out the program read your proposal before you submit it to be sure nothing got lost in the translation.

Now let's look at each part to delve more deeply into what makes a successful grant proposal.

Purpose of the Program

So what is the purpose of your program? You might be able to answer that question in one or two words: alleviate hunger; purchase library books; vaccinate children; find a cure; make a film. Unfortunately, you can't stop there. The funder knows that any number of organizations have programs that work toward the same purpose, so you must show why your charity should receive a grant to pursue this goal.

A strong, even bold, statement of purpose at the beginning of a proposal can grab the reader's attention and set an ambitious tone for the rest of the proposal. For example:

Community Food Bank will provide two meals daily to 100 homeless people, none of whom are now reached by any other agency.

Nonprofit managers attending the Managing Your Board workshops will come away with the knowledge and skills to transform their relationships with their boards, resulting in more productive nonprofits throughout the city.

People living in refugee camps will receive high school and college educations that will allow them to find work in the local economy, which is often the only way out of these camps.

Note that in each of these examples, I used the helper verb will instead of would. Will makes a more positive statement, implying that the project will go forward no matter what. Would is weaker, implying that the project is not only conditional on this grant coming through but perhaps on other factors as well.

Beginning grant writers often hesitate to make bold, sweeping statements, having been taught in English classes to avoid generalizations and not to make any unsubstantiated statements. Sweeping statements are a means of getting the reader's attention, and although you need to support your assertions somewhere in the proposal, the substantiation doesn't necessarily have to immediately follow your bold declaration.

You should always create a one-sentence summary that describes the project's essence in a way that makes a strong case for funding. And it should be a really good sentence! If you can't do that, you don't understand the project well enough to write the proposal. Review your notes and talk again with people involved in the program until you can write one dynamite sentence.

A good accompaniment for your bold statement (and possibly preceding it) is a dramatic and surprising statistic related to your project, such as:

- 2,800 adults and 1,200 children in our city go to sleep hungry every night.
- 98 percent of nonprofit executives identify working productively with their boards as one of their top three issues.
- The 400 children living in our city's largest homeless shelter have no access to after-school activities.

Why You Are Doing This Project

One of the critical points you have to make concerns the need for your program. The funder wants to know you have a thorough knowledge of the issue you seek to address and how what you propose to do fits in with what others are doing or have done. Is your approach different or complementary? Why is it needed? In what way will the program aid the program's clients? What would they do if your program didn't exist?

“Need” is one of those nonprofit words that get bandied about in many guises. Every project must fulfill some need, but every grant award is not "need-based." Need-based grants use the need of the applicant as the primary or sole criteria in deciding on the award. Disaster relief grants are an example. Your proposals will mostly be for merit-based awards. You'll not only have to demonstrate your clients' needs, but also why your charity merits the award.

The need for the program should resonate with your charity's mission. Just because you're a good organization and the community has a need doesn't mean your charity is the best one to address that need. Explain how this program fits in with everything else you do.

Proposals that are too inward looking—that is, concentrated too much on what your charity needs—are doomed to failure in most cases. Proposals that focus on clients' needs—the people you will help—stand a much better chance of success. Remember: funders make grants to solve a problem other than helping you make your budget goal.

Never trash the competition in your proposal. Today's competitor is tomorrow's panelist deciding the fate of your grant proposal. It's also not polite or necessary. That's not to say you shouldn't contrast your approach to that of other organizations, but you should do so in a way that offends no one. For example, you'll say...

The Community Food Bank will provide meals to 100 people daily who are now being missed by other social service providers.

or

The Community Food Bank will provide meals to 100 people daily who are unable to get transportation to food services offered by other social service providers.

Either version is much more positive than "The Community Food Bank will provide meals to 100 people daily who Food for People does not reach because of its unwillingness to look outside its immediate neighborhood."

You can make your need statement stronger by including in your proposal statements from neutral third parties that express or reinforce the need you seek to address. These could be stories in the press or studies groups other than your charity have done, including studies commissioned by funders. This not only gives greater credence to your cause, it also shows that your charity sees itself as part of the larger issue and that it keeps abreast of the latest thought on a subject. Here are a couple of examples:

The Daily Times reported that Mayor Thomas stated in his speech to the Rotary Club last week that "hunger remains one of the city's most pressing problems, especially among the transient population that lives on the fringes of the industrial area." Community Food Bank agrees, which is why we approach the distribution of meals through a mobile facility rather than depending on our main office to handle all clients.

Social Think Tank, Inc., in its report issued last month, drew attention to the difficulty that traditional place-based food banks have in reaching the most needy populations, which tend to exist outside central urban areas where most of these agencies are located. Community Food Bank agrees, which is why....

Testimonials to your charity's ability to carry out a project will also strengthen your case for support. We look at how to do that in detail in Chapter 17.

How You Will Make It Happen

You have to give the funder a concrete description of how the program will work. Be as specific as possible without putting too many limitations on your program staff. Will you meet with each client five times? How many hot lunches will you distribute? What are the steps your literacy program follows to involve adults and children? Let's look at a couple of short examples:

The Managing Your Board workshop series will consist of four weekly sessions, each lasting two hours. Workshops will begin with a lecture by an expert in board and executive director issues followed by a question-and-answer period. During the final half-hour of each session, participants will break down into groups of 10 or fewer to discuss what they have learned in practical terms that relate to their organizations. The themes of the workshops will be Avoiding Micromanagement, Helping a Board Fundraise, Making the Executive Director's Performance Review Work for You, and Building the Board You Need.

The Music for Kids program will provide musical instruction to young people living in the city's largest homeless shelter. Transportation will be provided to our partner's recreational facility after school 2 days each week. The emphasis will be on rhythm and simple songs, rather than trying to teach them how to read music. This remains a transient population requiring short-term goals each of the young people can meet. Most of the 90-minute sessions will be devoted to working together, but there will be time each day for more personalized attention from the teaching assistants.

Note that both paragraphs briefly describe the format of the sessions, give information on the content, and give the time participants will be involved in the programs. A real proposal would go into additional detail. You might also want to include a month-by-month timeline to show how the different steps in a program will come together.

Working as a Freelance Grant Writer

In This Chapter

- What it takes to be a freelance grant writer
- Developing a grant-writing portfolio
- Creating a professional resumé
- What makes a good client
- Assembling your tools of the trade

Starting a business of your own is a major decision involving many factors, including how much you'll need to live on until you start making a profit, how much profit you must make to maintain your standard of living, what support (financial and emotional) you can count on from your family in the meantime, and the local market for your skills. I can't go into all those factors here, but I will look at the specific things you need to know to run your own grant-writing business.

The Makings of a Freelance Grant Writer

The fact that you've made it to Chapter 23 of this book demonstrates you have a strong interest in grant writing. That's a great first step.

I hope you also have a high level of curiosity because that will make learning about the work of all of your clients a pleasure rather than a chore. A love of writing and language will also serve you well. You're going to find yourself spending many hours in front of the computer trying different ways to explain an issue to different funders. And if you're preparing similar proposals for different clients, you may find you need every ounce of creativity to say essentially the same thing in different ways.

The reward, of course, is doing well for yourself while doing good for the community. How's that for a win-win situation!

Developing a Portfolio

You'll need at least two samples of past work to be seriously considered for any grant-writing assignment. A writing sample such as a published newspaper or magazine article demonstrates whether or not you can write clearly and compellingly, but before someone pays you to write a grant, they want to know you also understand the grant process and how to write in a way that appeals to funders.

The best way to build your portfolio is to create a proposal as a volunteer helping a small nonprofit. This could be for your house of worship, kids' soccer team, community chorus, hospital auxiliary, friends of the public library, or any community group. You'll have the advantage of access to any past grants and descriptive materials they have on hand and be able to interview the people in charge and those who run the specific programs. You may even be able to talk to program participants (like your kids who are on the soccer team or your sister who is in the local chorus) for great quotes that will enhance your proposal. Additionally, this is a proposal you'll submit and get a result—hopefully a positive one!

Other opportunities to create your grant samples might lie with friends who need to fund a personal project. Artists are always looking for support to cover their time and materials, and people starting a new business might need help securing start-up money. A good business plan, after all, has all the elements of a grant proposal.

Two sample proposals are the minimum you'll need for your portfolio, but you'll ideally have as many as five, written for different projects or organizations. Potential employers seldom review more than two proposals, but with more to choose from, you can include proposals that most nearly match what your potential new client wants you to do for them.

All your sample proposals should at minimum include the cover letter, program description, and a budget. Do get permission from the people for whom you wrote the proposals before using them as samples. In some cases, an organization may not want its materials (especially their budget) shown to its peer organizations.

Creating a Resumé

You've now written three or four grants as a volunteer for one or more groups, some of which were successful, and you have a couple of other writing samples in your portfolio. Now you need a nonprofit-friendly resumé.

How do you present your experience to potential clients? You start listing your most recent work first (including freelance, volunteer, and staff positions). Put your education at the end. Be sure to include any experience you've had working with nonprofit organizations, even if your job or volunteer position was not in grant writing. All nonprofit experience shows your interest in and dedication to a cause, and nonprofits like to see that.

If you've done a lot of volunteer work over the years, group it together on your resumé for maximum effect and call it "Nonprofit Experience" to get the attention of your nonprofit client.

In addition to the grants you've written, include a list of articles you've published. You might include a Master's thesis if the subject relates to the grant work you're seeking, but don't include term papers. For example, if your thesis was on literacy education in immigrant communities and you're seeking work to write grants about literacy or education, this would be a good addition. (A thesis on the use of adverbs in the works of John Donne would not support your application for the job, unless, of course, you're creating a proposal related to English literature.)

Be sure to list any other professional writing you've done, whether for a newspaper, professional journal, press releases, or position papers for a politician. Any writing that demonstrates the story-telling and organizing abilities critical to writing successful grants shows that you can do well as a grant writer.

Do not apply for grant-writing jobs with only journalistic or public relations writing samples. These kinds of writing reinforce your writing ability, but someone who wants to hire a grant writer wants to see a grant sample. See the sample professional resumé on the next page.

Bragging Rights

Whether in a cover letter or in the resumé, some fundraisers like to make bold statements about how much they've raised. Avoid making this kind of statement. Fundraising is a joint activity that depends on many factors, including what cause the nonprofit serves, past success in raising money, standing in the community, and connections the nonprofit's staff and board have with funders. The artful creation of grant proposals is, alas, not the most important factor—although without it, the other factors may be meaningless. The person deciding if she should hire you knows this and will consider sweeping statements plain old boasting and of little value.

Similarly, quoting your success rate can be misleading. Someone writing proposals for a major nonprofit with deep community roots and a long history of service will have a very different

Valerie Clarkson

Fundraising Counsel and Grant Writer

2867 Broadway
Putnam Valley, NY 10579
845-555-9087
valerie.clarkson@putnamv.com

Grant Writing Experience

Happy Valley Humane Society, Putnam Valley, NY, 2010

General operating proposals for community foundation and three private foundations

Services proposal for county government

Mid-County Animal Shelter, Rhinebeck, NY, 2009-2010

General operating proposals for private foundations

Sponsorship proposals for two local corporations

Hardscrapple Road Animal Shelter, Salem, NY, 2008-2010

General operating proposals for private foundations

Other Writing Experience

"Unconditional Love on Hardscrapple Road," Putnam Country Ledger, November 2008

"Lyme Disease and Your Pet," Westchester Today, September 2008

"Shakespeare in Sylvan Glades," review in Westchester Today, August 2008

Other Work Experience

Hardscrapple Road Animal Shelter, Salem, NY, volunteer adoption counselor, 2006-2008

The Reader's Companion, Purdys, NY, assistant editor, 2002-2007

Putnam Health Services, Carmel, NY, office manager, 2000-2002

Education

B.M. in American Literature, State University of New York at Purchase

"Introduction to Grant Writing" and "Budgets for Grant Writers" seminars at The Foundation Center, New York, NY

Grant writing samples are available on request.

success rate than a grant writer raising funds for a brand-new organization serving an unpopular cause.

So what glowing things can you say about your work in your cover letter? You can objectively state how many proposals you've written and definitely highlight one or two successful ones if you have them. You can also write about what challenges you overcame in creating a proposal. For example...

- The nonprofit had not previously sought grant support and you had to start from square one to create everything.
- A major scandal about the nonprofit had been in the headlines, and you had to create a positive take on that controversy while making the case for support.
- The nonprofit called you two days before the grant deadline, and you completed the proposal on time.

Writing about a great relationship you had with a client is, of course, very positive. Be careful not to sound negative about anyone or any nonprofit you worked with! Just as in any job interview, you never want to be negative lest the person interviewing you wonder what awful things you might say about them one day.

Working with Clients

I'm a great believer in the idea that how you begin a relationship sets the tone for how it will continue. Be sure to get off on the right foot by presenting yourself as confident and professional. Be on time for all meetings, dress professionally, and always check and recheck your work before sending it to a potential client. Keep in mind that when you interview for a grant-writing assignment, you're there to judge the nonprofit's grant-worthiness as much as they're assessing your qualifications.

Do your homework before the interview. Go to GuideStar (guidestar.org) and study everything it has on the charity, including looking over its last couple years of 990 forms. (These also tell you what they pay their top people and help you judge how much you can charge them.) Use your favorite Internet search engine to see if the charity has been in the news lately, and go over the charity's website carefully. Come prepared with several questions about the charity's programs. Listen carefully to the answers, and take notes.

Clients to Avoid

Most of your clients will be thankful to have your help, supply you with the information you need, and pay you on time. Some clients, however, you'd best avoid.